14,000 years is roughly the time it would take a Sri Lankan sportswear worker to earn Nike CEO's £8m pot for 2010. While Adidas, the official sportswear sponsor for London 2012, can afford £100m in sponsorship fees, it is less sure about paying a living wage to workers making its products.

The Playfair 2012 campaign believes this isn't playing fair. These mainly female workers play a vital role in making the Olympics possible. Olympic branded goods like mascots, caps and bags are already available on our high streets, so our activism is needed now to ensure that workers making these products and all sportswear in global supply chains are not exploited. Evidence from past Olympics shows a poor track record on respecting workers' rights. As London 2012 fast approaches Playfair 2012 is stepping up the pressure on the Olympic movement and sportswear brands to make sure that workers have their rights respected and are paid a living wage.

Find out more about working conditions in sportswear supply chains from keynote speaker Nirosha Priyadarshini Manakanda Dewage, and learn about how workers in Sri Lanka are mobilising to win better pay and conditions.

As consumers we are linked to these millions of workers worldwide and by acting together we have the power to bring about change and demand that London 2012 is the first ethical Olympics providing Decent Work and dignity for all.
